Many people who have substance abuse disorders have much invested in denying that they really have a problem, in portraying themselves as helpless victims, and in disclaiming their role in the behavior that has brought them into treatment. He suggested that Stella consider telling her physician how she feels about his treatment. The major maladaptive pattern is an interpersonal pattern, and it is explored in the present, in the past, and in the client-therapist relationship.

Each of the four schools of psychoanalytic theory presents discrete theories. The psychodynamic model has always viewed the therapist-client relationship as central and the vehicle through which change occurs.
